Acknowledgements

We hope you find this year's Guide as useful as students have found its predecessors.

Thank you to Benjamin Chicka for his diligent work producing the Guide, and to Laura Ax for her editorial oversight. Thank you, too, to the faculty from Harvard's various schools, and from our colleague institutions, both for their continued recognition of the importance of nonprofits and civil society, and for their dedication to providing students with a multi-disciplinary array of courses on theory and practice. Deep thanks also go to the staff of each school's and institution's registration and elective curriculum staff, who supplied both course and cross-registration information.

Each year, the Hauser Center makes every effort to provide students with the most up-to-date information in our printed Guide. Because ideas are dynamic, however, new courses invariably emerge after our submission and printing deadlines. Student users of this Guide should not treat it as the final word on available courses. Please also consult our on-line version of the Guide, available at www.ksg.harvard.edu/hauser/publications, or the on-line sites of the various registrars' offices (see the Online At-A-Glance section on the inside front cover), which will have the most up-to-the-minute data.

Finally, we value your input. If you have questions or comments about this booklet, please email them to hauser\_center@harvard.edu. Best wishes for a fascinating and fruitful academic year.

Letter From the Director

Dear Students and Colleagues,

It is hard to believe we have entered the second decade of the Hauser Center's Guide to Nonprofit Courses: Harvard University and Beyond. Ten years into the life of the Hauser Center, it is thrilling to see how many more courses are available to students now. Our first guide was little more than a brochure. Today, it contains more than 300 courses from Harvard, Tufts and MIT. The Guide is an important part of how the Hauser Center serves students pursuing study and/or careers in nonprofits and civil society. It is also a measure of the inter-faculty and cross-school collaboration that we consider a hallmark of the Hauser Center.

We offer the Guide as a credible resource for choosing courses of interest throughout Harvard and the other two universities. The courses contained within it reflect the growing interests of students in these fields, as well as increased recognition of their importance to a wide array of careers and research. One of the Hauser Center's ambitions is to optimize interdisciplinary and intellectual resources at each school, and to bridge academic disciplines. Offering the Guide is just one way in which we seek to create that bridge.

This year's Guide also marks a year of tremendous transition for the Hauser Center. We will be celebrating our first decade with a review of some of the most influential work produced during that time. Keep your eyes and ears open, and your browser at www.ksg.harvard.edu/hauser, for announcements about related seminars and other events. Then, in January, Prof. Christopher Stone will assume the helm as faculty director, and we will launch our research and teaching agenda for the Hauser Center's second decade.

Again, I am pleased to present this year's Guide to Nonprofit Courses: Harvard University and Beyond. As always, we at the Hauser Center are grateful to everyone who generously offered his or her time and advice on this year's publication. Each year, the Hauser Center looks forward to compiling this important student resource and to another rewarding year of supporting students' interests in nonprofits and civil society. In our continued effort to provide information that is accessible as well as useful, you can also find this publication online at www.ksg.harvard.edu/hauser/publications.

Sincerely,

Mark H. Moore
