My three month research trip to Jerusalem would not have been possible without the financial support provided by the Dorot Traveling Grant, the Harvard Center for Middle Eastern Studies, and the Harvard Center for Jewish Studies. While in Jerusalem, the Israeli and the Palestinian peace activist communities graciously welcomed me into their homes and offices, providing guidance and encouragement. I want to thank the courageous individuals whom I interviewed for sharing their time, their personal stories, and their passion. To Gila Svirsky, Daphna Golan, May Kasem, Zahira Kamal, and Hanan Aruri a special thanks for understanding my commitment to my project and for challenging me to think harder about the subtleties of both “peace” and “activism.”

This thesis represents a culmination of my academic work at Harvard. My interest in the Middle East was sparked by the classes that I have taken with Dr. Laila Parsons, Dr. Carol Saivetz, Professor Ali Asani and Professor Cemal Kafadar. These instructors inspired me with their intellectual dedication to the complicated history, politics, and culture of the Middle East. Professor Michael Sandel and Professor Herbert Kelman were instructive sounding boards during the thesis writing process. Their feedback helped me to develop my theoretical analysis and its political implications.

My interest in Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking was born during the summer of 1997, at the Seeds of Peace International Camp for Conflict Resolution. I want to thank this community, both the campers and the staff, for contributing to my original interest in this topic and for sustaining me with the warmth of a surrogate family while I was in the Middle East.

I am indebted to John Paul Rollert, Jacob Goldstein, Talya Weisbard, Talia Milgrom-Elcott, Kamil Redmond, Tamar Miller, and Mohammed Al-Issis for reading thesis drafts. These classmates and mentors provided both editorial feedback and support during the homestretch. My roommates and friends — in and out of Cambridge —sustained me with laughter and much needed distractions. I thank these friends for also understanding the consuming nature of “thesising.”

I am grateful to my family for sustaining me in the past year — as always — with their love. Aliza and Dalia helped me to take myself less seriously. I need not look far for models of women activists; all three generations of Rosenman and Hochman women continue to inspire me with their passion for helping others. I am indebted to my parents who originally introduced me to the Middle East and transmitted their curiosity about the international world. Mom and Abba have also tried to instill in their children a commitment to values of all kinds, including a commitment to both caring and social justice.

Finally, working with Professor Jenny J. Mansbridge has been the most rewarding academic experience of the past four years. Jenny went above and beyond the thesis advisor call of duty, editing many drafts of each chapter, often overnight. Her enthusiasm for my project consistently energized me, driving me to push myself, to read more, to write and rewrite, and to critically question my intuitions and assumptions. Jenny exemplifies a passionate activist and scholar. From her I have learned how to write, how to think, and how to live. I will treasure this learning experience always.
